The Pavilion as a military hospital in World War I.

Information

In the mid 1780s, George, Prince of Wales rented a house near the beach in Brighton.
Brighton was becoming a popular resort for rich and famous people as it was by the sea and quite close to London.
When he had enough money, George improved his house to create a 'marine pavilion' with lots of art and decorative furniture.
This was completed in 1808 and had a domed roof and stables for 2 horses.
When he became Prince Regent (the monarch) he commissioned John Nash to transform the modest pavilion into the magnificent oriental palace that we see today. Many jobs were created for builders, craftsmen and tradesmen during the building.
George's presence in the town helped it to grow in population and prosperity.
The Pavilion has been used for concerts and as a museum and was used as a military hospital during World War I.
